New mines, old problems

As the search for energy transition metals spread across Southeast Asia, the experience of local communities in the Philippines, a nickel and manganese powerhouse, could foretell risks to environment, health and livelihoods.

By Benard Limonta, Corina Limonta, Ching Kiat Ho and Ngai-Ling Wong | Special Report | Energy | 14 November 2023

Formations are brewing in the Philippines as mining firms look for new sites, sometimes on ancestral land, to mine nickel – a hot commodity for manufacturing China's gadgets.

The troubles Philippine communities are facing could foreshadow similar issues in Southeast Asia, as the search for minerals essential for the clean energy transition unfolds in the region, along with the social and environmental issues. Are equitable benefits possible?

A Chinese tycoon who built a massive short position in nickel futures is facing billions of dollars in mark-to-market losses after this week's unprecedented price spike, according to people familiar with the matter.

Xiang Guangda -- who controls the world's largest nickel producer, Tangshan Holding Group Co., and is known as "Big Short" in Chinese commodity circles -- has closed out part of his company's short position and is considering whether to exit the wager altogether, the people said. Nickel rocketed to a record high above $100,000 a ton on Tuesday, driven in part by Tangshan and its brokers' activity, before trading was suspended.

The pervasive succession crisis threatening Japan's economy

The next 100 years might seem far away, but in Japan, the future is uncertain. A succession crisis is threatening the country's economic future.

There has been a steady decline in the number of Japanese companies. In 1980, there were 1.5 million companies in Japan. Now, there are only 1.2 million. Who will take over the companies that are left? It is a question that is becoming increasingly urgent.

As the population ages in the East, the number of people who are able to work and contribute to the economy is declining. This is a problem that is not unique to Japan. It is a global issue that is affecting many countries.

Japan is a country that has been successful in many ways. It has a strong economy, a high standard of living, and a rich cultural heritage. But it is also a country that is facing a succession crisis that is threatening its future.
